

VIKI GEUNES

Photography Kris Vlegels – Illustrations Carll Cneut

Lannoo

Preface
Arnaud Donckele	11

Preface
Viki Geunes	12

VIKI GEUNES 16

Cauliflower
The Brain from the Soil	22
Brainwork	26

Legumes
The rebirth of the year	29
Pod Power	32

Artichoke
That long-table feeling	35
Petals of Pleasure	38

Rhubarb
Cracking the code	41
Sour or not Sour, that is the Question	44

VIVIANE PLAQUET 46

Sea bass
A fish from the deep	51
Current Knight	54

Raspberry
Between love and lust	57
Red Temptation	60
Raspberry and rooibos Iced Tea	62

Scallop
Playing with fire	65
Armor and Tenderness	68

Tomato
The sun from within	71
Sun-Kissed Rogue	74

Grape
At the heart of the bunch	77
Bunch of Bold	80

Seaweed
Maritime elegance	83
Echoes of the Deep	86
Dry Dashi Martini	88

Pineapple
The art of ripening	90
Latin Summer Breeze	92

GITTE GEUNES 94

Hops
Liquid heritage	98
Two Heritages, One Brew	100

John Dory
In the shadow of summer	105
A Touch of Petrus	108

Citrus
The anatomy of an acid	111
Zest and Zephyr	114
Yuzu and Mikan Margarita	116

Pigeon
Where it all began	118
The First Flight	120

Oyster
The Chef who loves Oysters?	125
Aphrodisiac in a Shell	128

Veal
Pure, unspoilt potential	130
Milk & Muscle	132

Hazelnut
The warmth of autumn	135
Fireside Crunch	138

Coffee bean
Against the flow	141
Magic No. 53	145

AARON MOERAERT 146

The Scotch Bastard	151
--------------------	-----

Sunchoke
Between light and darkness	153
The Humble Star	156
Guinea fowl
Underdog with star potential	159
Chicken with an Attitude	162
Turbot
A mirror in two shades	165
The Quiet King	168
Razor clams
Of edges and borders	171
Sharp as a Knife	174
Langoustine
Skin on skin	177
Tender Touch, Royal Taste	180
Crab
Ebb and flow	183
Walking sideways	186
Morel
The renaissance of nature	189
Honeycombed Gift from Spring	192
Vanilla
An adventure steeped in mystery and character	195
Perfume of Time	198
Vanilla Espresso Martini	201
Caviar
Time captured in flavour	203
Saline Seduction	206
Cockle
The beating heart of the North Sea	209
Ridged-shell Heart	212
Brioche
The road that rises to meet you	215

Homestyle cooking	220
Oyster marinated	223
Oyster au gratin	225
Brioche	227
Tomato	228
Cockle	230
Artichoke	235
Legumes	236
Cauliflower	238
Sea bass	243
Veal	244
Pineapple	246
Recipes dishes	250
Recipes cocktails	284
Words of thanks	287
Colophon	288

SEA BASS

A fish from the deep

Wild sea bass is a noble fish: light, delicate and yet full of flavour. Having said that, I shudder when I see the bistros and brasseries serving the farmed version of this fish. The way I see it, the race to the lowest price can only end in one place: a homogenised, bland, inferior product.

This may sound extreme, but I remain convinced that the few true quality products out there must only be served at a certain level. I want to make clear I'm not arguing for exclusivity and against accessibility, but I'm making a genuine, heartfelt plea to better protect our culinary heritage. A fine dining restaurant distinguishes itself with its creativity, yes, but also absolutely by choosing the best product. So, just as industrially farmed vegetables have no place at this level, as a chef you need to be critical about what types of fish you offer and how they are caught. If we keep consuming sea bass at the rate we're going, soon there won't be any left. My message is to be more selective and mindful about what we serve where, ensuring that future generations will still be able to experience wild sea bass. Such a rare product should be treated with the respect it deserves.

Farmed sea bass is nothing like wild sea bass. It might be the same fish in the guest's perception, but people who can really taste know better. Texture, flavour, colour of the meat, the difference is obvious on every single level. Wild sea bass has a firmness that's pretty hard to imitate. The meat is not white so much as translucent, and has a delicate fibrous structure.

In the spring and summer, when the sea bass is at its best, I work with sport fishermen who bring in their fresh-caught fish. They sail out towards England or along the French coast, where they can guarantee an honest and quality catch from their day boats. This direct, personal connection with my fishermen means that I know what I'm serving, and that makes a huge difference to me.

Enjoying a sea bass with friends, with my wife and Gitte and Aaron, there's something inherently festive about it.

A line-caught fish, in the fishing season, immediately catapults me to the south, and I'm tasting olives, aubergine, capers, garlic and sweet peppers. I love to serve sea bass raw, or at most gently smoked—the mouthfeel is unlike anything else. In a menu I combine sea bass with anchovies, tomato and cockles. At home, I like to prepare sea bass in a salt or clay crust, which is the best way to preserve its pure flavour and natural character. I serve it with a Mediterranean ratatouille, or perhaps Asian side dishes: a papaya salad or a tempura of vegetables with steamed rice, nam pla fish sauce, chilli, lemongrass, kaffir lime leaf and coriander: unforgettable. This method is great because you just pop the fish in the oven and can return to the table and your company. Enjoying a sea bass with friends, with my wife and Gitte and Aaron, there's something inherently festive about it. Besides serving the fish this way, the atmosphere, the moment, the conversations are all at least as important.

Gastronomy is more than cooking; it's taking responsibility for the future of our oceans. We're overburdening the sea, and the ecosystem of wild fish is being exhausted fast. When all is said and done, gastronomy means respecting what nature has to offer us and understanding what products merit a certain exclusivity. And sea bass is one of those—no question about it.

Current Knight

Sea bass — carabinero — myoga — wasabi

The spiciness of wasabi and myoga cuts through the richness of our kombujime-aged sea bass. Accented by the lightly peppery shiso flower, the intense sweetness of carabinero and jelly tapioca pearls.

HOMESTYLE COOKING

I see cooking at home as an extension of what I do at Zilte. Not by imitating complex dishes, but by embracing that same level of attention. Small gestures, unexpected combinations and careful presentations turn an ordinary weeknight dinner into a special moment.

In this chapter, I share some of the “homestyle” recipes I like to cook myself to make the most of those moments. Dishes that are refined and varied, but at the same time accessible enough to prepare and share at home. Because just like in a restaurant, cooking at home is all about emotions, surprises and the magic of being together.

